MAKING THEM AMERICANS

How few of us realize the importance of making over the foreigner—of implanting American ideals, ideas and common sense in place of socialistic and maybe anarchistic theories. It means a lot to every American citizen. This work and many other interesting activities of the Department of Labor are discussed in the twelfth issue of the series of beautifully illustrated booklets on Our Government which we have been distributing to representative citizens of this community.

If by any chance you have failed to receive regularly your copies of this series that has been so favorably commented upon, visit us today and from the limited supply on hand we will gladly complete your set.

Yesterday the two little children of Mr. Cuno, who lives near Stonewall were sent out by their mother to pick up some sticks to make fire about noon. The childred were 4 and 5 years of age. The little ones wondered off in the woods and lost their way, and parants becoming alarmed started a search for them, which resulted in finding them, tired and asleep in a barn more than two miles from home. When found each had its arm-full of sticks for mother. The night was cold and both would have died from cold if not rescued, doubtless.

HANDSOME MAUSOLEUM ERECTED BY ANNA PORTNER FLOOD TO THE SACRED MEMORY OF HER LATE HUSBAND, H. D. FLOOD, ON THE PUBLIC SQUARE AT APPOMATTOX, VA., DECEMBER 10, 1922.

REMAINS OF H. D. FLOOD SLEEP IN APPOMATTOX

The remains of H. D Flood now rest in his native county. Sunday morning a private car bearing the remains and immediate members of his family arrived here from Washington, where the remains have been resting in a private vault for a year, he having died there on December 8th, 1921.

When the train reached here the Masons took charge of the body—the following acted as pall bearers: Col. Joseph Button, R. F. Burke, L. F. Ferguson, J. R. Horseley, H C. Babcock, W. P. Gills, B. F. Olen, L. E Smith and W. A. Moses.

A great crowd followed the remains to Liberty Baptist church, where Mrs. Trinkle, wife of Gov. Trinkle, rendered several violin solos; she was accompanied by Miss Kate Franklin at piano A special choir rendered several very sweet selections.

Rev. W. W. Pippen, pastor of the Presbyterian church, to which the deceased belonged had charge of the services and introduced Hon. S L Ferguson, who in turn introduced U. S. Senator Swanson, the orator of the day.

Mr. Swanson, who studied with the deceased at U. Va., served with him in Congress, and waged together many fierce political battles in the State, spoke for an hour of the virtues of his departed friend and at times was eloquent as he pictured the careers of the leading statesmen of Virginia among whom he placed the late Representative Flood.

"He was an aggressive leader, cheered and loved by an enthusiastic following. He hewed his way to the front with the battle axe of a warrior. He despised preferments obtained by the insinuating arts of the demagogue. His chosen place of action was on the field of battle and not in the cloister of intrigue and diplomacy. He was the Rupert of the Virginia democracy, bold, courageous and daring. He cheerfully and proudly wore scars obtained by fidelity to friendship or for a cause espoused.

He possessed a persistency and perseverance of purpose which would have attained distinction in any vocation of life selected. When he reached a conclusion in the course of life no obstacles could deter him in continuous effort to reach the attainment. He was the personification of tireless energy and determined effort. He hammered, hammered and hammered until success came. His industry was as much an element in his success as were his moral and intellectual qualities. From early youth to death his life was one of ceaseless activity. This sapped the foundations of a constitution phenominal in its robustness and strength, and occasioned his early death.

* * * * *

These splendid moral and manly qualities were further enriched by a gentle nature and an affectionate heart. Like all true Virginians he cherished almost to a passion the ties of blood and family. Never in all of my experience have I seen a sweeter, deeper and more enduring love than that which he possessed for his only sister. This love was a flower he cherished in his youth, and its fragrance filled his heart until the hour of his death.

The shadow of death never fell upon a purer, sweeter happier home where mother, father children lived in mutual adoration. His love for his beautiful and accomplished wife went to the deepest of his noble heart. A widow now weeps where almost yesterday a wife adored, two orphans now mourn where almost yesterday two children lovely played on father's knee. He was a most dutiful son, a generous loving brother, a most devoted, attentive and incomparable husband and father.

* * * * *

He had just passed the age of 21, which made him a citizen, when he was elected to the General Assembly of Virginia, being at that time the youngest member of that body.

He at once attained prominence by his indefatigable industry, his ability as a debater, his thorough and varied information upon legislative matters. He was at this youthful age one of the most potential members of the General Assembly and his rapid advancement gave promise of his career of high honor and great usefulness to his State in politics.

He was shortly afterwards elected Commonwealth's Attorney of Appomattox county, which position he held for years, filling it with marked ability and fairness and increasing his reputation as a lawyer and the esteem of the people of his county for his faithful and fearless discharge of his duties. He practiced law at the bars of all the surrounding counties and soon acquired one of the largest and most lucrative practices in his section. He was recognized as a leader of the bar of the courts in which he practiced.

So successful was his career in the General Assembly and in his administration of the office of Commonwealth's Attorney that the people of the several counties in which he practiced law soon sent him to the Senate of Virginia, which position he filled for many years with marked ability. He was practically the leader of the Virginia Senate, a body composed of able and worthy men, and many of the great legislative acts which benefitted the people of Virginia were the products of his brain and the handiwork of his masterful hand.

In 1896 he was nominated for Congress by the Democrats of the Tenth Congressional District, but was defeated in that election. He might have availed himself of legal technicalities and possibly have received the certificate of election. I recall how manfully he repudiated any suggestion to accept such a commission and forcibly stated that he never wished to represent a people unless he was satisfied he was entitled to do so by the people's free and fair choice. This splendid conduct endeared him more to his friends and won the esteem and respect of his enemies. He desired no honor not fairly won and honorably bestowed. I recall meeting him a short time after his defeat, which would have ended the political career of most men, but it did not in the least affect his stout heart nor lessen his firm and honorable ambition. In this the only defeat that ever came to him in his long and successful political career he displayed a manly worth, a hopeful courage and a fearless determination which proved his greatness as much as any triumph that crowned him. It is in the hour of defeat and disaster that the innate greatness and power of men are displayed. Those who can triumph over the discouragement incident to defeat will long wear the crown of success This profound truth was fully illustrated in the life of our dear friend.

Four years after this the Democratic voters of this Congressional district resominated him for Congress. He was overwhelmingly elected and continued to serve the people of his district until the hour of his death—for more than twenty years.

His career in Congress was one of great usefulness and marked distinction. An able accomplished and thoroughly equipped debater, he was listened to with great attention and had much influence in the House of Representatives. He was chairman of the Committee on Territories of the House and was for many years largely responsible for the legislation governing our territories.

This entailed great work and responsibility on him which he efficiently and faithfully discharged. He was the author of the resolution which admitted Arizona and New Mexico to statehood, and thus to him belongs the honor of placing the last two stars in "Old Glory", thus completing the statehood of continental United States. Under his wise and constructive statesmanship the measure was enacted giving to Alaska, that land of wonderful wealth and enchanting romance its first legislative assembly, forming the greatest epoch so far in its civilization.

He was made Chairman of the great Committee on Foreign affairs in January 1913, which responsible place he held as the House was Democratic—until 4th of March, 1919. He was Chairman of this great Committee, with all of its vast responsibilities and burdens, during the great World War and until sometime after the conclusion of peace. During the great World War he occupied a most important place in the House of Representative as Chairman of this great Committee. He introduced in the House and secured the passage of the resolution declaring war against the Imperial German Government, and opened the debate on this resolution with a speech of rare ability, clearness, eloquence and power. This address made a profound impression in the entire country and marked him as a man of unusual ability. In the House of Representatives, with all of its conflicting views and interests the responsibility of guiding our foreign affairs during the great war was entrusted to him. It was a most difficult task requiring rare ability, masterful management of men and great skill. He fully measured up to the responsible duties imposed and greatly added to his established reputation as a debater, parliamentarian and statesman During those dark days and by by the handling of those grave responsibilities he grew from a State to a National character, becoming one of the potential and trusted men of the nation If he had lived and continued in the House of Representatives the highest honors or most important posts the House had to bestow were within his grasp. He had attained an acknowledged position where the highest honors would inevitably crown him.

He was made Chairman of the National Democratic Congressional Committee which directed the campaign for for the election and return of Democratic members in all the congressional districts of the United States. He was absorbed in this work, conscientiously and industriously meeting all the vast and varied duties appertaining to this important position. But this was not the limit of his work and responsibility when he died. The Democratic State Committee of Virginia had unanimously elected him as Chairman of the Democratic party to conduct the last gubernatorial election He went into this election with all the energy, activity, zeal and enthusiasm he possessed, he campaigned the State, he organized the Democratic party, He put spirit enthusiasm and determination in the Democratic ranks, and by his indomitable energy, judgment, wise and courageous management of the campaign he achieved the greatest success ever obtained by the Democracy of the State. We have the consolation of knowing the last days of his life were cheered by this splendid Democratic victory and was crowned with the loving admiration of a grateful State Democracy.

He was a member of the Constitutional Convention and one of the most influential members His work in this convention alone would have entitled him to the everlasting gratitude of the people of Virginia. He was a member of the State Debt Commission which amicably settled the existing debt between Virginia and West Virginia. His judgment, his ability, his skill, his power of managing men were largely instrumental in effecting the happy results of this delicate and intricate matter.

It is well that Hal Flood's remains will rest in the dear old county of Appomattox He loved every inch of her soil, her people were closer to him than all others. How often in speaking of the future and of his old age, had he pictured with delightful anticipation living among her kindly people and engaging in the cultivation of the farm which he cherished to a passion We lay to rest here one of Appomattox's most distinguished sons, one who brought distinction to this county, one who was a potential factor in the distribution of blessings to State, Nation and Humanity He comes to remain among the people who loved him with a deep affection and who had for him a confidence and admiration never excelled".

Gov. Trinkle was the introduced by Hon. R. L. Burke and in a few well-chosen remarks the governor paid a high tribute to the character and worth of Mr Flood.

Rev. H P East dismissed the audience and then the Masons leading the procession bore the remains of Hall Flood to the Courthouse square and deposited them in the beautiful granit mausoleum, in which his two infant children rest C M. Danforth, of Burkeville, Grand Deputy Master conducting the service. Rev. W. G. Bates offered the prayer.

Among those present were: Senator Claude A. Swanson and Carter Glass, of Virginia; Gov. and Mrs E. Lee Trinkle, Colonel and Mrs. Joseph Button, Congressmen J. P Woods, ex-Senator Charles F.
